ABSTRACT

The bibliographies cited in this collection deal with substantive issues in mass communication. Entries exclude media as creative forms, technical aspects of production, indexes, and union lists. The 234 entries--all works published since 1924--are arranged according to the following categories: (1) advertising and public relations, (2) broadcasting, (3) comparative mass communication, (4) film, (5) general works, and (6) journalism and print media. Abstract

As the amount of information available to social scientists multiplies, the importance of reference tools such as bibliographies increases. Bibliographies provide maps through the information maze, starting places for researchers or students. This checklist on mass communication contains 234 bibliographies published since 1924. Entries are arranged in the following subject categories: Advertising and Public Relations, Broadcasting, Comparative Mass Communication, Film, General Works, and Journalism and the Print Media. Only English-language bibliographies were included. The entries deal with substantive issues in mass communication and exclude media as creative forms, technical aspects of production, indexes, and union lists.

Sixty years ago, Walter Lippmann recognized that the world was too vast and complex for any individual to know it personally. Our view of the world came to us through the mass media of communication. Fifty years later, William Rivers in The Opinion Makers called it a synthetic world, largely created by the mass media, thereby confirming the power and pervasiveness of the media.

Today the world grows increasingly complex, information becomes a commodity to be bought and sold, a resource with the potential to bring power and wealth to those who possess it. The media of mass communication gain in potential as new media are created (the latest being cable television and satellite communication), existing channels multiply (U.S. periodical titles have nearly doubled in number since 1950), population access to media channels increases (percent of U. S. households owning television sets rose from 9 percent in 1950 to approximately 98 percent today), and the users of media channels find new, subtle ways of using mass communication to further their own ends.

It remains vital to retain a picture of how modern mass communication has developed, where it is going, and how it influences our daily lives. Every year social scientists add scores of thousands of documents, papers, articles, books to the collection of research and analysis about communication history, channels, effects, content. Bibliographies provide maps through the maze, excellent starting places for the researcher or student about to embark upon his or her own research. Although there are many mass communication bibliographies and guides to reference books, each usually containing several bibliographies, there is no bibliography of mass communication bibliographies. Even in this day of computer searches, a printed bibliography has great value when viewed against the waiting times, expense, and complexity of computer searches.

Bibliographies also have great value in highlighting the areas where the most research has been conducted, and the gaps where additional research is needed. There are indications of which research interests have been recognized as sufficiently important or popular to require preparation of bibliographies. Finally, bibliographies are valuable aids to the organization of verifiable truths into a coherent, comprehensive body of knowledge about mass communication.

The following literature search yielded 234 bibliographies of journalism and mass communication published as books, articles, papers, documents. The bibliography is limited to separately published bibliographies of English language sources (or those primarily in English). It includes bibliographies dealing with U.S. and international journalism, mass communication, and its various channels, effects, content, history, and research. It excludes materials dealing with the media as creative forms, including the techniques of writing, acting or photography. It excludes the technical, production aspects of the media, such as electronics, printing, film production. Also excluded are literature guides, directories, indexes, union lists, and other lists of titles of media forms such as movie titles, periodical, and newspaper bibliographies. Also excluded are bibliographies of theses and dissertations and theses and dissertations which are bibliographies. The only mimeographed reports included are those available through Resources in Education : RIE (the abstract journal for the Educational Resources Information Center--ERIC) or those included in the Online Computer Library Center (OCLC) database. ERIC accession numbers follow bibliographic citations where applicable. Advertising and public relations bibliographies were included only as these disciplines related to mass communication or media channels. Business, interpersonal, and space communication bibliographies were excluded. This bibliography attempts to emphasize sources readily available through most academic libraries or interlibrary loan procedures.

The search began with the card catalog at the Kent State University Library. The most valuable source of bibliographies were the mass communication bibliographies themselves. Other indexes and reference tools searched were: Resources in Education : RIE, Library Literature, Film Literature Index, Bibliographic Index, Cumulative Book Index, Subject Guide to Books in Print, book reviews and new publication listings in Journalism Quarterly, and individual indexes and tables of contents in journals that frequently carry bibliographies, such as the Journal of Broadcasting, Journalism Quarterly, Journalism History, Journal of Popular Film and Television.

The resulting bibliography has been organized by subject for ease in locating useful items.
